COURT DISSOLVES

In Future, Washington and Tusculum College Will Go Their Own Ways.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.] ion handed down to-day in the case of A. S. N. Dobson and others against the trustees of Washington and Tusculum College, Chancellor Hai H. Haynes, of Bristol, declared the union of Washington College and Greeneville and Tusculum College, which was effected more than three years ago, to be null and vold, for the reason that the act providing for the union of colleges and schools was violated in that the required two-thirds vote for the consolidation was not had. The listitutions, operated as one for the past three years, will now be separated, unless the Supreme Court shall fail to sustain the chancellor.

This litigation is of wide interest behanded down to-day in the ca when the Revolutionary heroes of the battle of King's Mountain marched from Sycamore shools, in East Tennessee, to conquer Ferguson's men, thus registering what proved to be the decisive conflict of that memorable war. It was Doak's benedigtion that inspired the men with new zeal for the task before them. This same Doak founded these two schools, which were the first chartered institutions west of the Alleshamy Mountains. The records of Washington College reveal that at one time there were twenty-five graduates of that institution in the upper and lower houses of the United States Congress. That was at a time when Washington College was the centre of education for a wide territory, extending all the way to the Mississippi. The fight between the friends of these two schools to have them divorced grew out of an alleged effort on the part of a majority of the trusjees of the consolidated schools to wipe out the Washington College school and concentrate everything at Tusculum. Another feature that makes this litingation and the chancellor's decision of general interest is the fact that these schools number among their friends and supporters such noted persons as Andrew Carnegie, who recently contributed $25.000 to the endowment fund, and Mrs. Nettle McCormick, of Chicago, widow of the reaper king, who contributed many thousands of dollars for the erection of buildings at the Tusculum branch of the school.

The defendants have prayed an appeal from the chancelor's decision, and the case will be heard when the court sits in Knoxville in September.

(Special to The Times-Dispatch.)

JEWELERS FIGHT
SORDID SCHEMES

Alinia, and the whole American nation, for that matter, owes its existence to the jewelers' art. In support of the statement he retold the story of old Powhatan and Captain John Smith; how the wiley Englishman prevailed upon the Indian chief to accept a string of blue beads, products of the jewelers' art, in exchange for several boatloads of own and other groceries when the colony was on the verge of starvation and all other offers had proved of no and all other offers had proved of no aveal.

"Your business," he told them. "is to cater to a strong natural propensity of man, and also of woman. Spencer tells us that decoration preceded dress in the evolution of mankind, and I am quite ready to concede its truth." The Mayor welcomed them to Richmond, rich in historic interest, progressive in its policy, with its face set toward the rising sum—a city which feels honored in being host to so representative and important a body of men.

Twonty-four Karat Club. As he sat down a Western delegation started them to which seemed pretty general if from the applause that followed Mr. Jahnke's words of welcome. Trouble was soon encountered in carrying the tune, and the popular ditty died down to for the lack of an orchestra to guide it.

On behalf of the delegates T. L. Combs, first vice-president of the National Association, responded to the welcome. His account of the way W. T. Dabney, of the Richmond Chamber of Commerce, gobbied the 1911 convention for Richmond, caused an uproar, in "That man Dabney," he said, "in his official and personal capacity came to Detroit last year, backed by our peerless friend Jahnke and another municipality representative, and at the very moment that Pittsburg had us all persuaded that this year's convention belonged to her, he halted the business and the ballot, and by his picture of the intorical attractions and entertainments of Richmond, the warmth thorough review of the peculiar problems which confront the retail jewelers at this time, supplemented with numerous suggestions as to the means to be used in working them out. He sounded a general call to arms against unscrupulous competition. "I do not believe there was ever a time in the history of the jewelry trade of this country where there was such great need and urgent demand for organization as now. From the small dealer in the country town to the millionaire jewelers in the great cities there is a call for help to save from unscrupulous and fraudulent competition and a score of evils that are a menace to the legitimate jeweler."

He scored the destructive tendency on the part of many jewelers to branch out into side lines which are foreign and obnoxious to the craft. Such practices tend to the demoralization of the art, and must inevitably result in a lowering of standards. "The fulness of time has come in the jewelry business when the sheep must be separated from the goats—the intelligent from the makeshift, the mechanic from the tinker, the goldsmith from the junk shop, the jeweler's art from the crude makeshifts of the department store and the diamond business from the glass factory."

Vital Trade Question.

The diversion of a great share of the jeweler's business to the department stores, in the opinion of President Roberts, is only temporary. Perdent deep resident Roberts, is only temporary.

the jeweler's business to the department stores, in the opinion of President Roberts, is only temporary. Personal@y will win out in the end, and the public will eventually trust no one but the retail jeweler of high personal character with his important purchases. "I have never yet met a man, woman or child who was proud of the fact," he said, "that they had bought their watch from a mail order business or department store. They are always reluctant in telling you so, and act as though they had committed or were guilty of some crime in so doing."

Once the public is taught by persistent and truthful advertising the advantage of dealing only with reputable local dealers, the mail order houses will get only the cheap and worthless business. The manufacturer, he said, who sells direct to the consumer is an enemy of every retailer, and should receive the denunciation of every organized body. In the same category must be placed the manufacturer, who sells to his employes, who in many cases resell again at a small profit, to the damage of the ligitimate retailer. Some of the more insistent reforms and institutions which are needed are stringent laws governing fraudulent and misleading advertising, technical schools for the training of watchmakers, standardization of products by means of trade-marks and quality stamps, fixed selling prices, jewelers art craft schools and more efficient co-operation between the manufacturing, jobbing and retailing branches of the Englises. ing, jobbing and retailing branches of the Sullness.

Silver a Feature.

The display of silver is dazzling, and is perhaps the most striking feature of the exhibition. One of the most dazzling exhibits of the entire show is that of a New York arm, showing the new platinum jewelry. It is claimed to be the latest fad in Europe and is many times more expensive than gold. It is one of the most expensive exhibits of the convention. The annual report of the secretary. Claud Wheeler, shows that the National Retail Jewelers' Association is in first-class condition. More than 1,000 nev members have been added to the rolls of the organization during the past year. Starting six years ago with an asgregate capital represented $200,000, its membership to-day represents a total wealth of $30,000,000.

Something in a Tail Glass.

Chairman W. H. Schwarzschild, of the entertainment committee of the Twenty-Four Karat Club, was called on for a speech at the Jewelers' Convention yesterday morning. He modestly stated that he was born and reared in Richmond, and hence could not make a public speech. But he could make a talk, which he proceedes to do. It wasn't about the jewelry business, either. It was about the sood things that they had in store for the delegates. "For to-morrow night," he said, "we have arranged a banquet in your honor, at which we will have everything good to eat and something to drink, to say nothing of the best music we can got in Richmond, and then covisiting us will be taken over the city automobiles. Friday we will all god own the James for a boat ride, and we will have a long thin glass with cracked lee, and in this thin glass with cracked lee we will have free convention of the circus subsided Mr. Schwarzschild beat a gracefu
